Free Facebook Hacker is a utility that allows you to download facebook friend list with each. Many major Western universities in the US and around the world are shutting down their campuses this week as American and British researchers face a global threat to their work. This year, there has been an unprecedented leap in the numbers of malicious emails hitting university systems around the world. There are now more than twice as many incidents as there were at the same point last year, with reports from the US, Europe and the Middle East. The increase seems to be connected to the Islamic State group, which has claimed responsibility for hacking into computer systems and dumping data on the internet. In August, the group boasted that it had hacked into the computers of the White House and stolen information on the US government's nuclear secrets. But there have been many more breaches since the group led by the notorious hacker "Lazarus" first struck in August 2013, according to the agency. In the US, the number of cyber attacks is up from 54 in 2012 to 63 so far this year. The victims of those attacks included the US Secret Service, the CIA and the Department of the Interior. British universities are taking the threat of cyber-attacks seriously, with staff warned of the consequences if they fall victim to malicious email messages. "We don't want to scare anybody," said Professor Andrew Ferguson, of the University of Surrey. "The real issue is that we have a higher education system that's falling behind countries that are doing significantly less. "We're in a space that's growing rapidly and we're going to be tested." Ferguson said there were instances of threats of violence against overseas academics and that the university had issued a warning to staff about the potential for emailed threats of violence. More than 500 universities have been affected by cyber attacks since September last year, according to the University and College Union. They include the British universities of Oxford and
